A computerized system for vertebral analysis and diagnosis is presented. The system consists of a general purpose computer with a graphics display terminal, a digital input/output device, a television card, and software. With a relatively simple schematic diagram, which depicts a patient's spinal column and several specific views, a program is generated which simulates a radiologist's examination of a phantom. Although a human radiological observer can analyze a phantom with complete efficiency, this simulation is only partially successful. The delineation of vertebral bodies, however, is very detailed and as good as that seen by a human observer using conventional techniques. The program allows the operator to decide the angle of view, the characteristics of the luminescent phosphors, the level of gray and the format of the image. The system's graphics ability can be enhanced by using different color schemes, blending the areas of the phantom that are to be displayed in a single color or in a mixture of colors, and enhancing the color contrast to emphasize sharp delineation of the image.Q: Detect who kicked a player in Minecraft Classic The kicking functionality has changed in Minecraft World Edit.
